

Expanding the no-fly zone around Washington DC won't make downtown DC any safer. Using GA aircraft for a terrorist attack is too expensive and complicated to conduct considering the small amount of damage it would cause. It's much easier for Al-Qaida to simply rent a single van and drive downtown. If this type of practice (knee-jerk airspace restrictions) is going to be the future of this country, we might as well start with banning all trucks from downtown DC, banning all cell phone use on buses and subways, banning all backpacks and briefcases from all public areas. Where does it stop?
